This invention relates to an apparatus and method for shaving razor bodies and for cutting laminates and rails for supporting and guiding razor bodies. Razor blades are either single edged or double edged. In the double edged razor, the cutting portion of the blade is generally curved and is referred to as the guard. The guard covers the cutting portion of the blade and is used to protect the user's skin.

The blade is held in a rectangularly shaped frame structure referred to as a cartridge. Most cartridges have a structure referred to as an up and down back and forth action. When used to shave, an individual pushes the cartridge in a forward direction. The cartridge slides across the skin and the blade is moved back and forth in an up and down action. Shaving is accomplished by the individual pushing the cartridge back and forth. The up and down motion helps to ensure that the cutting portion of the blade is moved across the skin as the cartridge is moved. The back and forth motion assures that the cutting portion is rotated when the cartridge is in a forward position. It has also been proposed that the cartridge has a continuous back and forth and up and down motion. In this case, an individual holds the cartridge so that it is stationary and moves the razor across the skin in a forward motion. There are a number of disadvantages that are inherent in all of the above described mechanisms for using a razor. With a mechanism having a continuous back and forth and up and down action, the individual must maintain a downward pressure on the cartridge so that it does not rotate. If a large force is not applied, the cartridge may rotate and the blade will not be moved across the skin in the back and forth motion. With the mechanism having the back and forth and up and down action, the user must move the razor across the skin and therefore the user must exert force on the razor. To prevent the razor from rotating, the user needs to continuously exert pressure on the blade. Prior art method for forming razor bodies are disclosed in U.S. Pat 595f342e71
