One problem with the acquisition of microwave images by radars, such as, for example, air traffic control radars, is the fact that the ability to distinguish the same target in a volume of real time is generally very difficult. In essence, the processing electronics that are used to analyze the acquired radar images are presently too slow to process the acquired radar images. Presently, for example, it is common to have some kind of auxiliary antenna that serves as a control antenna for pointing the radar at the target, beacons that might indicate the existence of objects in the volume of air being looked at, and a target acquisition and tracking system that can select and track a target. filamentous fungus Nectria haematococca down-regulates vegetative growth, appressorium formation, and appressorium turgor of conidia of Arabidopsis thaliana. Growth of filamentous fungi on living plants causes damage to plant tissue and often precludes crop plant cultivation. We tested a model filamentous fungus, Nectria haematococca (anamorph: Glomerella cingulata), for the potential to cause infection of Arabidopsis thaliana. Wild-type and appressorium-defective N. haematococca mutants were studied for morphological changes and interactions with Arabidopsis plants. Light microscopy of infected leaves revealed that the invasive hyphae of wild-type N. haematococca were partitioned into long (400 +/- 80 microm) and short (220 +/- 60 microm) hyphae. The conidia of the wild type were readily able to penetrate the epidermal cells of Arabidopsis and hyphae with conidia grew within the mesophyll to penetrate the epidermal and stomatal cells. In contrast, mutants of N. haematococca with defects in their ability to form appressoria did not penetrate the epidermal cell of Arabidopsis or cause any apparent damage. However, the conidia of the mutants were unable to germinate into appressoria, and appressoria of wild-type N. haematococca were unable to gain turgor from water uptake in their absence. These findings suggest that host-induced germination of conidia of wild-type N. haematococca is dependent on appressorium turgor. In addition, the ability of conidia to germinate into appressoria is developmentally and environmentally regulated.

Q: How to prevent Exception to be thrown when a method is invoked with different thread in Java I am trying to execute a Method on the Runnable in another Thread and that Method has a method that throws Exception. When I call this method within the same thread the Exception is thrown but the code runs fine when called within a different thread. I was trying to catch this Exception and did not find the proper method for doing that. I think it should be handled from the top level or from the underlying classes
